Most accounts of addiction either see it as a disease, and hence outside the addict's control, or else as involving chosen behavior, and hence within the addict's control. Contrary conclusions about responsibility are held to follow. We argue that this involves a false dichotomy. There is good evidence that addiction does involve a pathological decoupling of wanting and liking-addicts ...

Rethinking addiction | The Psychologist

That is, the correlates of quitting are the correlates of choice not compulsion. However, addiction is, by definition, a disorder, and thereby not beneficial in the long run. This is precisely the pattern of choices predicted by quantitative choice principles, such as the matching law, melioration, and hyperbolic discounting.
